Greening Corrections People, Programs, and Practices

Energy conservation and renewal have been around for many years, but it has been only recently that they have come into worldwide focus. Individuals, families, governments, and organizations today now make “going green” an essential part of their daily routine, and correctional facilities should be no different. As microcosms of learning and instruction, correctional facilities can demonstrate leadership in applying green principles to everyday operations, making green processes part of daily cost-saving strategies, and optimizing the role of green industries and instruction in preparing offenders for reentry and workforce retention.

“Greening Corrections: People, Programs, and Practices” is the latest satellite/Internet broadcast to be hosted by the National Institute of Corrections. It provides governments, institutions, and corrections community partners with answers to some of the challenges that accompany the process of switching from traditional ways of doing business to more environmentally friendly practices. Viewers will learn how to apply green principles throughout the justice system, promote green stakeholder partnerships, demonstrate environmental stewardship, identify opportunities for workforce development and correctional industries, and implement best green practices in cost savings.
